STARFIRE:
DO IT DARINGLY

An Interview by Izzy_Beta

The camera is blurry, a sharp flash of red and orange and white before the scene comes into focus. Sitting upright, with one leg crossed over the other, is a very powerful woman known most notably to the world as Starfire. And a star she is.

Atop a crisp, white couch, she dons matching milky lounge wear, calling further attention to the fiery reds and pinks of her hair, her pure orange skin, and her stark green eyes. Aside from mesmerizing, her appearance can only be described as otherworldly, though there is much more to her character than that.

She is a champion to men and women alike, saving thousands alongside our earth's finest heroes. And now, with courage and confidence, she's taken the fashion world by storm.

"Are you ready, Kory?"

"As I'll ever be," she responds, before pausing. "How's my hair? Does it look good on camera?"

"It does."

Kory smiles.

“Can you introduce yourself to your future viewers?”

"Yes," she says, before falling into a more natural position. She waves, a down-to-earth air about her despite a giant, shining movie star smile. "Hi everyone! You may know me as Starfire. My name is Kory Anders, and I'm so excited to sit down today and discuss my career."

"How would you describe your career?"

"How would I describe my career... Well, I like to think that it's simple, even though it's all over the board! I'm a model, on one hand, and that's what I'd consider my career, but I have other jobs too. I'm also a role model and an activist, and I save people, in a literal sense. (laughs) If you're asking what it is I do, I do everything. Everything I can get my hands on. Oh, but if you're asking for my professional, resume-written answer, I model various designer clothing brands for a living."

"Who is your biggest inspiration?"

"There are lots of people who inspire me! Some in my personal life and some from afar. When it comes to fashion, I greatly admire lots of famous icons for their distinct and intriguing styles. And there are truly, many different categories of fashion nowadays.

I find it most wonderful that there is so much inspiration to go around. I'll come across an article, or an old television show—which will be very new to me—or I'll notice a funky pattern on a set of drapes, and something in those things will make me discover something else that will become a focal point in my work. Even a stranger on the street can be an inspiration when you have a creative mind, and I think I do have one. Whether I'm selecting clothing items for myself or emulating the certain energy of someone who draws me to them, I'm inspired by everyone and everything.

This, of course, also applies to my life outside of fashion. This may surprise you, but I am...unique, here. (laughs) And some of my greatest lessons about this world, about what it means to be a good person and how to inspire others, especially, come from my close friends who inspire me."

"What drew you to becoming a model?"

"I like having my picture taken. (smiles) I almost want to leave my answer at that. It would make my good friend laugh and shake her head. She's a photographer, you know."

"What challenges do you face in your modeling career?"

"There are a lot of challenges. Modeling is fun and glamorous, but there is more to it than just posing and wearing attractive clothing. You have to maintain professionalism and come prepared to work tirelessly until every shot is perfect. Oftentimes, you're met with harsh criticism, and people don't always see you as a person. They see you as a product. This is the case for many models, though I would say that my particular background plays into this issue a lot. I have bright orange skin and glowing eyes... (laughs) Don't look surprised, I'm sure you were waiting for me to address it! I'm either something to marvel at or something too different and uncomfortable to stand.

I have come across many amazing opportunities in my field of work, but modeling can be dangerous and uncomfortable, too. Judgment is a big part of it, and some standards are simply impossible to live up to. I think it's important that everyone, especially young girls, are aware of the drawbacks in this industry."

"What has it been like since Earth learned about your true identity? How does it affect your work, both as a superhero and as a model?"

"I've come to the realization that maybe my thin disguises weren't as protective as I thought. (laughs) I feel quite silly for not understanding how little they did before. But now that people across the world know about me... There's been a wide range of effects.

Being a superhero is dangerous work, and I would never want that to adversely affect anybody in terms of safety. Having my name out there, and the name Tamaran known is scary. And I have been met with a lot of backlash from people who are afraid of me or do not understand what I am. I've lost fans because of it and jobs because of it, and I've had people protest my involvement in any matters—modeling or otherwise—here on Earth. Even though some of Earth's most famous, beloved heroes are not of this planet either! Can you even believe it? (laughs)

At the same time, though, attaching one public aspect of myself to another has been very gratifying. Even with all of the complications, I am freer to be myself and to inspire, and I think that my journey has really resonated with people. That's what I'd like to believe anyway!"

Do you have any advice you'd like to share with your fans?

"Advice! You asking me that makes me feel like I've really made it.

If I had one piece of advice to give anybody—regardless of age, gender, or dreams, I would say "do everything daringly." It's more than okay to be scared or nervous, but you just have to go for it, whatever it is you're reaching toward. Be loud about what you enjoy and what you deserve, and be passionate in everything you do, because, believe it or not, not everyone is. And it's a shame not to be!

Everyone deserves the ability to express themselves. Be the person who sticks out because of what you choose to be known for. At the end of the day, your narrative is in your hands. And that's powerful!"

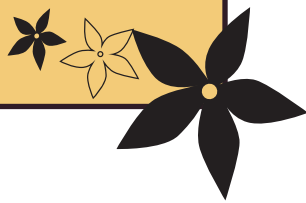
Kory Anders

Written by Isa

Dear Kory,

I just moved out of state for college. I'm a college freshman majoring in biology. It's my first semester here and I've made no friends. I didn't know anyone going here, which is why I chose it. I was ready for an adventure. I was ready for new faces, new people, and new friends, but instead, I'd spent the last month eating dinner and lunch alone. I'm debating on transferring to a closer college to home or just resigning myself to being lonely. Do you have any tips on what to do?

Sincerely,
Feeling Lonely



Dear Feeling Lonely,

Thank you for writing this letter to me. I first would like to express my dearest sympathies, as it seems you are going through a difficult time. The time of young adulthood can be very fun and incredibly lonely, oftentimes both feelings overlapping. Leaving one's home and traveling to another state can feel like traveling to another world and that is a feeling I understand well.

When I was younger, I went through a similar place transition as you did. It was done more out of necessity, rather than desire, which is something I have spoken about before. There was difficulty in finding a place that felt like home to me, so I empathize with this struggle of feeling out of place with your new college.

My biggest struggle when doing this move was my initial inability to open up and secure those friendships. Because I felt so alone, I struggled with how much of myself I should share or felt comfortable sharing. I wanted these people to like me and feel connected to them. What if I said something that ruined my chances of feeling comfortable with them?

These worries were luckily unfounded. The people I managed to connect with not only became my closest friends but became some of my chosen family in every sense of the world.

Every day I am overjoyed to have found people that are my chosen family and who I turn to whenever I want to share anything - my joys, my frustrations, and my sadness - and they will take it all in stride. Not only that, they will assist in helping me when I need it. I am forever grateful for them. I understand that my results may be somewhat unique and the people I connect with may not become as close to you as my friends did.

My 'Titans' - what my group of friends and I call ourselves, though even using the word 'friend' feels as if I am diminishing their role in my life - have managed to make me feel always at home with them, even if it's been months since I've seen them. I know that whenever I get the next chance to see them, it will be like I never left their side. Donna, Roy, Wally, Dick, Garfield, Victor, Rachel, and Garth, among the others, have such a unique way of fitting in a niche in my life I didn't even know was missing. It is something I will always be grateful for and it is something I dearly wish for everyone to have.

My first suggestion to you, Feeling Lonely, is to reach out on your campus and through your college to find clubs and activities that you enjoy. A point of commonality is a good starting point for having a friendship. The other major factor is proximity and continued viewing of one another - it's simple psychology. It's why in people's youth, all of our friends turn out to be people we went to school with - they're the people we have the most access to.

These friendships may not immediately be people that are your friends for life and they may never become that. They may just be casual friends who you're able to grab lunch with during the week and hang out with on the weekends. This may not be your desired outcome and that is okay. Your people, your chosen family, may not be at this college. That doesn't mean you must move away to find them. The people that you will find, and I know that you will find them, will help you grow and have an impact on your life. If you are still looking for these friendships through your college or campus, reach out and look around your local city to see what events they are holding. You are not the only one to feel like this, and unfortunately, you will not be the last. It is a hard, unfortunate time to go through, and it may feel like this is how you will always feel. However, you will be able to feel good again. You will be able to get through how you are feeling.

My last piece of advice for you is to gain confidence in yourself. This may not be the only time in your life when you feel lonely and unwanted. Take this time to learn skills on how to be comfortable alone. Pick up some new hobbies, watch some new tv shows, or even learn more about yourself. Self-growth can happen at any time.

All of this may be advice you have already heard. Maybe you have reached this part of the letter and are rolling your eyes at my advice. That's okay, I don't know your exact circumstances and what you have already tried based on your letter. However, I can already tell you are an exceptional person. It's hard to reach out and ask for help - particularly to a stranger who you're not even sure will reply. Your people and your time will come. Don't worry about that.

Feeling Lonely, I want you to know that I am wishing you the best. I am hoping that I will hear from you again and that you will be updating the world about your adventures. However, even if you don't, that's okay. College is not everything - life is a journey and you'll find where you fit in time. Don't rush it - you may end up in the wrong place that way.

If your home happens to be a place you've already been, by the way, don't worry about that either. Those people will find their way back to you, or you'll find their way back to them. Home and people are funny like that.

I hope some of this resonates with you, feeling lonely. I know that everything feels scary and lonely right now, but that will change. Whether it be through friendships or through finding comfort in yourself, you'll find your way. I promise.

Sincerely,
Kory Anders

KORIAND'R

A DAY IN THE LIFE OF KORY ANDERS: A REAL STAR ON EARTH

Interview by Sam

Kory Anders, otherwise known to the public as Starfire, is a woman out of this world—quite literally. She is the leader of the famous Titans, a role model to civilians and heroes alike, and a star with a personality as bright as her gorgeous, fiery hair. Despite seeming like a larger than life super-hero and a goddess among us normal folks, Kory is actually much like you and me: a humble, friendly, and kind woman who longs to continue to seek justice for the people of Blüdhaven, the new home of her and her team, as well as the good people of Earth. Her story is a tale for the ages, one we had the honor of hearing and one we have the honor of telling you all about today.

"I grew up on a beautiful planet, Tamaran," she begins as we sit in the Conference Room, Cyborg going over our clearances and credentials. "It's very different from Earth, and much like Krypton, our people do not have powers due to our physiology and our atmosphere."

She compares her home to that of the deserts of Nevada or Egypt, except it is sufficiently hotter. Their atmosphere is breathable only to their people, and they have two suns and three moons, but they're mostly hidden by the seemingly never ending dust storms. She says that those are not as bad as the ones we have here.

Despite the large families they consider normal on Tamaran, Kory's family unit only consisted of herself, her sister Komand'r, her brother Ryand'r, and her Mother and Father. They lived in a large palace, like many others, and she spent a lot of her days training, learning, and occasionally playing with friends in the dune fields.

"It was a peaceful time for a while." Kory reminisces, "I do miss my parents and my brother dearly as well as my sister despite her betrayal. But I forgive her for her transgressions, though I believe she is still upset with me. It is a shame...we were good friends. The best of friends, I believed."

The planet had been peaceful and they managed to stay so for a time. It was a wonder how and why she had left Tamaran at all. It sounded like a lovely place to live, though that was just the beginning of her story.

"Peace, as we all know, is never meant to last," she says lowly, smiling flipping into a frown, "and then...it was over."

Kory Anders first touched down in sunny old San Francisco just a few years ago—she fell out of the sky as a teenager, having been running from a group of "Gordanians", a race of aliens that had taken her from her beautiful home of Tamaran and captured her people.

"We are a kind of warrior race, you could say," she tells us, cradling a cup of coffee between her hands, "but Tamaraneans are loving and peaceful people. We are skilled, but we prefer to not engage the enemy if conflict can be avoided."

Unfortunately, her people had been blindsided by the attack and it hadn't taken long for the hostile race to overtake her planet. In order to spare their planet, her father made a valiant sacrifice and gave Kory to the enemy, thus leaving her sister to sit the throne she had to leave behind.

"Oh, so you're a princess?"

"Oh, yes, in a way," Kory admits with a blush and a bashful smile, "though that title meant very little, especially now. I prefer my current station anyway. It is...more peaceful, in its own way."

We now follow her to the lounge area of the Tower from the Conference Room, Kory wanting us to be more comfortable and even offering us drinks while she continues on with her tale. Raven hugs her on the way by, all smiles as they share a brief exchange (showing us that Kory is truly a kind and loved member of the team) as we continue on. She informs us that she sees Raven as a little sister, and that Raven has come out of her shell since she first joined the team.

Back to our time in the lounge, she continues on to tell us about how she became a Titan, or rather the "Teen Titans" at the time, having been found by Nightwing, then a Robin, Wonder Girl (Troia), Speedy (Green Arrow's sidekick), Kid Flash (sidekick of the Flash), Beast Boy, and Bumblebee. Her fight with the Gordanians had escalated from space into our atmosphere and into the San Francisco streets. It was a long fight, but with the help of her newfound allies, they quickly cleaned up the mess and sent the aliens running.

"It was an interesting fight, for sure," Kory recalls as she sits in a recliner, glancing out of the giant window to look out at the Bludhaven Harbor, "I didn't know much of Earth's language, so I had to quickly adjust."

"Did it take you long to learn?"

"Oh, well, no," Kory admits with a smile and a chuckle. "My species learns the languages of others via lip to lip contact, or "kissing" as you call it."

"Oh, so did you have to kiss quite a few people or...?"

"Oh, no. Just Nightwing," she says in a very nonchalant manner. "Speedy offered to help me learn Spanish, but I wasn't familiar with the language nor thought it necessary back then."

From then on, Kory, taking on the alias of "Starfire", quickly rose to fame and became known as a prominent and constant member of the Teen Titans and then eventually the Titans. She admits to us that it was hard to say goodbye to many members as they either quit or transferred out to other teams, such was the case with Nightwing, a close friend, who works with her now but apparently had been working alongside Batman and the "Batfamily" for a long time and then another team out in Happy Harbor.

"I cherish all of my friends and hope they are doing well where they are now," Kory says, a hand going to her chest to the spot right above her heart. “Others, I miss dearly. It is not easy in this line of work. Some friends are not so lucky and pass on. Many lives have been lost during our battles.”

Her smile falters as she takes a moment to think about those she’s lost, and we give her a moment of silence. A tear comes to those emerald eyes as she takes a tissue from the box I offer her. She apologizes and gathers her composure, sitting straight up as she composed herself with a deep breath and another smile.

“Apologies. Part of my sorrow goes out to those we have lost to a recent tragedy,” she informs us, further explaining what that tragedy was.

After years of growing and making a name for herself in the superhero community, she and the Titans actually started up a school: Titans Academy. The school is currently in the process of being rebuilt out in San Francisco after a tragedy a couple months ago totaled the building and leveled it to the ground. Kory started out as just an occasional guest teacher there. After some time, she rose to Headmistress but continued to help out as a teacher now and again.

“It was quite the experience,” she admits, “I enjoy working with the kids and helping them to grow into the superheroes they are today. Quite a few of them reminded me of myself when I was their age—learning to improve and grow my abilities and working with others just like me.”

“That sounds awesome. You are truly a hero and a role model.”

Kory blushes at that, saying that she would like to go back to the Academy and help out some when it’s rebuilt. When she has the time, of course. It is just one of her many duties.

“Speaking of duties, I hear you also have a modeling gig on the side?”

Kory lets out a laugh at that, nodding, the sound light and airy on the ears, “Oh, yes! I am surprised you knew about that!”

“We heard that you were going to be participating in a charity event in Metropolis this weekend. If I may ask; how long have you been in the modeling scene?”

Kory smiles fondly to herself as she looks down at her boots, sitting up a bit straighter as she looks back up at our crew, the smile reaching her eyes. This seems to be a favorite topic as she practically bounces in her seat.

Apparently, her modeling career began a couple years after she landed on Earth. It was something she had gotten into because of Donna Troy (the first Wonder Girl), famous photographer and a friend of Kory’s from the Titans. She had actually done it for years and clearly, was still modeling to this day. She modeled for multiple agencies, saying that her “extraterrestrial appearance” was what helped make her popular and made her very much sought after by a lot of those agencies.

“I was actually looking into starting my own fashion line as well,” She says, “I wanted to bring the culture of my people and our style here so I may share it with the good people of Earth. I am still trying to figure out how to get started in doing so. We’re aiming for next Spring or Summer at the latest!”

“Well, we will certainly be on the look-out for when you do. From what you’ve told us about Tamaran, we would love to see your fashion line!”

Kory’s smile seems to widen at that as she gives a small bow with her head. “Thank you.”

“If I may ask, what are your plans for the future? Do you plan to stay in Blüdhaven with the Titans or are you planning on going on your own or joining another team elsewhere?”

“The Titans are and always have been my family,” she says, tone solemn. “Where they go, I go. The future is ever changing, so I do not always know what it holds. How does the saying go? “The future is a mystery”?”

“Something like that, but it’s very much true! Anything else you want to tell the audience and your fans? Any advice for up and coming superheroes? Or those who want to do some good in the world?"

Kory smiles once more. She says that she doesn't know exactly what to say in terms of advice, but more so says that anyone can do good, whether it's helping out a neighbor or even just cleaning up trash off of the streets. She also added a final message: keep your loved ones safe. Spend as much time surrounded by family and friends, and treasure that time, and forgive your enemies, because you never know what tomorrow might bring.

"And lastly, always believe in yourself, because you're surrounded by those who love you and will support you. No matter what," she says, "because that's what happened to me, and I am exactly where I am supposed to be."

And there you have it, folks! An exclusive interview with Kory Anders: superhero, supermodel, teacher, friend, role model, and Titan.

(Tune in next month for an exclusive interview with Beatriz da Costa!)

This zine, like all great projects, is the product of many people's contributions. Thank you to our contributors first and foremost—the zine would not exist without your work. You're all true Kory fans, and your passion really shines through every single piece. Thank you for dedicating your time and energy into making something beautiful! It's your art and writing that drew buyers to STARFIRE: A Fashion Zine and allowed us to raise money for Nomi Network in the first place. I can't express how exciting it's been to see everyone's progress and watch the zine come together.

I'd also like to thank my mod team. Raven, Red, Marzue, Mari, you all have been instrumental in the creation of this zine. Raven, your design work is incredible and a godsend; Red, thank you for helping to communicate to the contributors; Marzue, thank you for helping smooth out problems; Mari, thank you for talking with our writers! I could never have done this on my own.

Finally, thanks to our buyers. No money would've been raised without your purchases, and we hope you enjoy what we've made! Thank you all for your support!
